When I first arrived in Bandung, it felt like I was stepping into completely new territory. Hardly anyone spoke an inkling of English (so imagine the pain that came with asking for directions), and crossing the road almost felt like the last move I’d ever make. However, it didn’t take long for me to become completely mesmerised by the city. From its bustling streets lined with food and drink vendors, to its beautiful landscape surrounded by mountains and rainforests and hillside vantage points, Bandung had me captivated.

Not to mention the diverse group of people who I’ve met and exchanged cultures with so far, and the sweet children I have the pleasure of teaching (who affectionately call me “Miss Nami”).

My AIESEC exchange has opened me up to a whole new world and I can’t wait to see what the next 5 weeks has in store for me!
I still remember the day when I first came to Kenya two weeks ago. Everything was so new to me. I was kind of nervous because of all those unfamiliar faces around me but also excited to explore this whole new world. Being a foreigner here draws so much attention from the local people that it makes me feel sort of uncomfortable sometimes.

For my project, Zaidi ya Dream, I’m currently working at a children’s home with a social worker to do some counselling work. Most of the children here are just like any other ordinary, happy and healthy kids. I’m so glad that I came all the way to Kenya and I feel so blessed to be around these adorable kids.

Volunteering and living in this beautiful country is definitely one of the best moments of my life.
